Spending a few days away from your desk with the most important men in your life—that’s definitely the best part of a bachelor vacation. And the second best? No, not the “elite” strip club your buddy found through some deep Yelp/Foursquare/Reddit research. Second best is all the drinking. It’s basically a college do-over, only with cooler guys and higher-quality liquor. To that end, we’ve put together five bachelor party destinations famous for their local alcohol scenes. Pick your drink of choice and get ready for everyone to buy you round after round.

Tequila in Tequila, Mexico

Tequila, Jalisco, Mexico

No, it's not just a margarita mix-in (or a means of getting everyone at the frat party sloppy). Good tequila, made from 100% blue agave (the cheap brands knock that down to 51%), is rich and tasty and perfect for sipping. If you already knew that, you're a man who'd love a bachelor party in the scenic town of Tequila, Mexico. It's in the Jalisco region, one of a handful of counties that can legally produce tequila (you know, like champagne having to be made in Champagne, France). Just outside of its charming downtown, orange-and-blue agave fields blanket the valley at the foot of rolling hills, and they all have tours and tasting rooms. La Rojeña, the oldest distillery in Latin America, is a favorite, and Tres Agaves' gorgeous, just-built distillery is slated to open to the public by the fall, with a sun-splashed, architecturally awesome tasting room and patio. You'll probably fly into Guadalajara, and from there you can take the Jose Cuervo Express into town (book the train's VIP cart for an educational tequila tasting en route). Epic, si?
